About This Game

In Industry Giant II like its predecessor you start from humble beginnings to industry billionaire in this simulation, you will guide a company's development, right from its beginnings to – with any luck – an industrial giant. You control every aspect of an expanding business – building factories, developing products, paying wages, pricing in retail outlets, even operating the transport network.

Economic booms, stock market crashes, oil crises, upswings, triumphs... Now you can become the greatest power in industry! Begin in the year 1900 with little money but large ambitions and through skillful decision-making you can build up an enormous business empire. Make critical decisions which products you should manufacture, where to gather the best raw materials, where to sell them and how to effectively transport them there.

It's your choice whether you start out as a small-time fruit-growing farmer with a little orchard and retire as the owner of the biggest foodstuff empire around, or end up owning a multinational conglomerate with a vast portfolio of products.

An out of date game which lacks of Quality of Life features and uninteresting train system, not industrial system as the title advised. There is no keyboard shortcut and the game itself is already micro-management intensive. The background sound drives me crazy and is prone to cause heart-attack due to the over-tuned volume of car horn (as loud as a car is running behind you) or a sawmill cutting sound (x3 bigger than UI sound). The transport vehicles are like joke, they claim to run 70 mph yet it takes the whole year to move goods from left to right border, which I believe it's as long as half of the globe in real life.
